History: Werner knew the jokes would keep coming. At home they had made sure he would expect it. People were going to laugh at his visor.

The surveillance itself was trivial. Disney still wanted the sound of the street. Werver would talk to his friends, picking up the latest gossip, and then he would go home and write it all down.

Work for hire spying was dubiously ethical, but it put food on the table.

The arrangement with Disney wasn't ideal, by any means, but Werner just wanted to get his work out there, where people could see it, read over it, and glean what they could from what he had to offer. He figured he'd have time to make money later in life.
